ESPN’s Outside the Lines Reveals Seton Hall Sports Poll Results on Steroids Following Admission by Alex Rodriguez

26% Say More Than Half of MLB Players Currently Use HGH

Today’s (Sunday’s) Outside the Lines revealed the results of a public opinion poll following the admission by Alex Rodriguez that he took steroids. The phone poll, commissioned last week by ESPN and done by the Seton Hall Sports Poll, which is connected with Seton Hall University, queried more than 500 “people who follow sports.” Questions ranged from what caused baseball’s unprecedented power-hitting numbers and what would you think if those power numbers were to decline significantly, to whether Rodriguez should be voted into the Hall of Fame.

Among the findings:

- Despite the notion that allegations and admission of steroid use will prevent players from being elected to the Hall Of Fame, fans are split on whether Rodriguez or Barry Bonds should be elected, while of those who answered the question, most believe (43%-36%) Clemens should be elected.

- More than 80% of respondents believe there is current use of HGH in baseball. More than 25% of the respondents believe over half of the players are currently using HGH.

- Nearly three times as many respondents believe steroids are more prevalent in MLB (61%) than in the NFL (22.3%).

- The economy is perceived as a much bigger problem for baseball than steroids. Of those who say they will attend fewer games this year, 74% say it is because of the economy, 6% says it is because of the use of performance-enhancing drugs in the sport. Further, fans say players making too much money is baseball’s biggest problem, and say that by a 40% to 23% margin over steroids.

- While more fans (30%) say home-run hitting is their favorite aspect of the game, overwhelmingly they say a decline in power numbers won't decrease their interest in the game.
